

Ben Eisel

General Manager, Plymouth Office
Rudolph Libbe Group

Growing up in a family that was deeply rooted in agriculture, Ben always thought he would follow that path when choosing a career. But when he had the opportunity to attend the University of Toledo he pursued mechanical engineering. He realized this was a much better fit for him—he always gravitated toward working as a team to solve technical issues.

With a lot of great experiences under his belt, Ben started his own construction company after graduation. But seven years later he was ready for a new challenge and wanted to work in a larger variety of industries. He began working for the Rudolph Libbe Group in 2010 as a project manager in the site management department.

Nearly nine years later, Ben continues to enjoy the fast-paced delivery in the industry and is fascinated by the changes in technology that help him serve owners and clients. He is a firm believer in delivering projects safely, reliably and accurately since this is the best way to create a life-long customer. With RLG's multitude of specialty trades, he often finds himself educating owners on their process and maintenance needs—building trust which frequently leads to repeat business.

After a successful shift toward business development, Ben was named the general manager of RLG's Michigan operations in 2018. He is known for developing outside-the-box solutions for clients when it comes to meeting deadlines and expediting projects when possible. As general manager, Ben hopes to educate the Michigan market on RLG's capabilities by maintaining an open dialogue with customers and staying on top of industry trends.

Ben is a strong supporter of co-op programs and STEM education. Outside of work he serves on the board for the American Farm and Education Center and is founding and active member of the Assumption Education Foundation.
